SplashLink Providing Relief During National Infrastructure Week

Cleveland, OH May 17th, 2017 – SplashLink, water’s online platform and the leading source for water and wastewater funding opportunities on the global market, is marking National Infrastructure Week by providing free access to its resources for hundreds of municipalities and utilities.

Having provided connections to over $10 Billion in capital, SplashLink links the nations water suppliers to resources that sustain the public health of their communities. “With the inclusion of water’s largest public and nongovernmental funders, we can bring utilities and municipalities access to funds that they did not previously know were available and that can be deployed immediately,” says Ebie Holst, SplashLink Founder and CEO.

In many parts of America, infrastructure is crumbling, inefficient, and inadequately designed to meet 21st century needs. As federal funding for water projects continues to decline, utilities and municipalities must turn to unconventional sources of capital. “Tapping into alternative ways to fund water projects is crucial,” says Jason Wuliger, SplashLink Co-Founder and Vice-President. “Millions of dollars in capital are offered through nongovernmental sources each year, with more coming online all the time, and SplashLink provides those responsible for maintaining our infrastructure with access to these funds so they can provide their communities with a safe water supply, and efficient treatment process.”

National Infrastructure Week, May 15th – 19th 2017, is a week of events, education, and advocacy efforts held around the country to encourage infrastructure investment and recognition that infrastructure decay is a critical issue impacting everyone in the United States. Organizers hope to encourage policymakers to invest in projects, technologies, and strategies that improve infrastructure and promote the prosperity and safety of all Americans.
